Announced by Meetup, the Platform Proven to Increase Feelings of Connectedness

"Keep Connected" Podcast Launched to Celebrate and Inspire Community Connections

NEW YORK, Jan. 26, 2021 /PRNewswire/ -- Meetup, a social media platform dedicated to building communities, is unveiling some of its learnings in Five Ways to Feel More Connected to mark the launch of the company's podcast, Keep Connected. Culled from nearly 20 years of experience in connecting 52 million members through meaningful ways, Meetup has boiled it down to five simple strategies anyone can do to feel more connected--right now. The complete findings are found on Meetup.com, with key takeaways below. Keep Connected is available on Spotify, Apple Podcasts, Google Podcasts and everywhere podcasts are found.
"We continually hear from people and leaders who tell us how real, human connections improve all areas of a person's life," said Meetup CEO, David Siegel and host of Keep Connected. "As a company that's always been at the forefront of community building and social media, Meetup feels a responsibility to do two things: share our learnings on how to foster authentic connections, and share real stories--which are heartwarming, inspirational and actionable--about the great things that happen when people come together."

Meetup's Five Ways to Feel More Connected is compiled based on the company's experience, input from mental health experts, peer-reviewed studies, plus a recent study by ImpactED at the University of Pennsylvania which evaluated the impact of Meetup on those who use it regularly.

Notable recommendations include:
1. Eye Contact (Even on Zoom!) - Making eye contact with anyone, including strangers, helps with an increase of oxytocin, a hormone known to improve mood and emotions. Your brain automatically reacts to seeing the whites of another person's eye, even if that eye contact takes place over Zoom or a video call. Try out this Zoom hack: position the picture of the person you are chatting with beneath your device's camera to increase eye contact. Set a goal to get more eye contact in one or two more interactions per day.

2. Learn or Try Something New - With fewer social commitments, it's all too easy to slip into a nonstop rotation of mundane routines. Break that rut by experiencing something new or learning a new skill. Pick up supplies to try out a hobby or craft. Prepare for the future when you can safely travel again by learning phrases in a new language. Pick up an instrument or learn how to code. Because opportunities to experience something new dwindle over time, the simple act of trying something new increases a release of oxytocin which is extremely valuable in improving mood, mental health, and happiness. Another positive effect of trying something new is a sense of accomplishment.

3. Build Perceived Emotional Synchronicity by Gathering with Others - A study published in the Journal of Personal and Social Psychology shows that gatherings consistently strengthen identity, as well as enhance personal and collective self-esteem and efficacy, positive affect, and positive social beliefs among participants. To find a safe gathering with people who share an interest with you, browse the Meetup events being hosted online, or socially-distanced events in person that follow local guidelines where it is safe to do so.
